Maui Boosted
By Mrs. Yates

Well Known Writer Tells of Beauties Seen On Valley Island. Interesting Article.

When Maui can advertise an automobile road to the summit of Haleakala, Maui is going to have a big boom says Katherine M. Yates in the Advertiser. Not only a boom organized by mainland tourists, but also, and to even greater extent, will her neighbors of the other islands pay their enthusiastic respects.

Everyone who goes to Maui returns an ardent devotee to her beauties; but unless he possesses confidence in his endurance, he also returns with poignant regrets that he could not have visited the House of the Sun. Just why this should be, is a little hard to understand, since the trip is far from an arduous one; there being but eight miles of horseback travel, over perfectly easy ground with absolutely no dangerous points to pass. However, the very names of "horse-back" makes it sound like something of an undertaking, and there are plenty of people who shy at an idea a great deal quicker than they do at a much more serious fact. And so they continue to leave Haleakala until "next time," depriving themselves of a lot of pleasure, and the country of a lot of worthy advertising such as they would involuntarily furnish after having made the trip.

Furthermore, a great many, both home folks and tourists, who have never been to Maui at all, would go if they could reach the crater in an automobile. The fact is that the human mind is desperately fond of concentrating upon one feature. People will go to a place to see one great wonder, but tell them that there are a dozen wonders just as great in that same locality instead of one, and at once each of the dozen sinks into comparative insignificance, and interest flags. Hundreds and hundreds of people go to Hawaii and don't even consider the matter of taking the tour around the island, no matter how much they are told about the many marvels upon that trip. But if there were only one lava flow on the island, and that the marvelous flow over in the Kona district, and it were featured, the chances are ten to one that nearly every tourist would go over there and see it and then send his friends.

And so it is with Maui. She offers so many things, and people say: "Yes, I've heard that it is a wonderfully beautiful island, and some time I'm going over there." But when Haleakala has a motor road to her door, and Maui becomes a one-feature island, with innumerable other features for good measure, then the attitude is going to change, and the word will be: "Have you been to Haleakala? Well for goodness sake why don't you go? You're missing the experience of a lifetime. It's the most wonderful thing in the world."

And Maui is beginning to recognize this, and it will not be long before the winding red road will continue its way to the top, and Haleakala will become an acquaintance of the many, instead of only a name full of mystery and remote interest to all but a few. When she ceases to be so exclusive, she will become a most exceedingly popular hostess. Under the ban of "wonderful but difficult of access," she draws a few; but when she once opens the pathway to her door, the world will keep it worn smooth and hard with travel.

Of course it might seem to some that, with so much road building to be done in the county, and so many sections crying for their share, this particular bit of road is scarcely the most necessary; but when one contemplates the quick returns that will come in, when Haleakala appears upon the bills as a part of a volcano excursion, with boat schedules which will allow for satisfactory connections; then it would seem that, for the big prosperity of Maui, such a road is of vastly more importance than any other eight mile stretch upon the island.

And Maui is ready to take care of tourists and to do it well. Excellent chauffeurs meet all of the boats, and the road from Kahului to Wailuku is a joy to travel over, wide, smooth and without a flaw in its nearly four miles. Of course everyone goes to Wailuku direct from the boat, because Wailuku is the center of everything. The hotels are there, and all which goes toward a tourist's comfort and satisfaction is there. It is the county seat and railroad terminus and makes a perfect basis for whatever tours or journeys are contemplated. The hotels have airy rooms, perfect plumbing (a big, big item!) beds which are a comfort to weary bones, food such as keeps you in admirable humor all the time that you are there, and so cheery an atmosphere that pessimism cannot find a breath of its own kind to sustain itself. And there is no hour too late or too early for them to bid you welcome and prove themselves cheerfully ready to look after your comfort and your pleasure.

Of course there are a number of small towns and plantation villages which are unprepared for guests without notice, because they are rarely called upon to furnish entertainment; since nearly all who come have informed themselves beforehand that Wailuku is best adapted, in both situation and preparation, to looking after the visitor and helping him upon his way; but there really seems to be no reason for making demands upon these.

And so, when Maui gets her motor trail out to the door of the House of Sun, she will suddenly have so many strangers—and neighbors—within her gates that even her most ardent optimists will be astonished, and the things which will happen over there in a business way will make a whole lot of people begin to sit up and take notice.
